

Contributors

Peter Rogers is a doctoral candidate in the Department of History at Simon Fraser University. He studies European intellectual history, and his dissertation is concerned with the incorporation of classical Greek themes in the development of a modern, labour-centered theory of human nature.

Matthew Smith completed an M. A. at the University of Alberta on the history of attention-deficit/hyperactivity disorder and American psychiatry. He currently works as a career advisor at the Northern Institute of Technology, and plans to begin a Ph.D. program studying the history of psychiatry soon. His article is the result of taking a graduate student seminar on colonial Latin American history at the University of Alberta.

John Barwick is a provisional doctoral candidate in the Department of History and Classics at the University of Alberta. His field of study is modern China, with a particular interest in the history of Christianity during this period. His dissertation will examine the social impact of Chinese Protestants during the early decades of the twentieth century and their role in shaping a Chinese modernity.

Maxwell Zhira is a Master of Arts student in the Department of History and Classics at the University of Alberta studying the recent history of his native Zimbabwe. His M.A. thesis will explore the roots of the post-independence crisis in Zimbabwe, from 1980 to the present.

Roberta Lexier is a provisional doctoral candidate in the Department of History and Classics at the University of Alberta. Her M.A. degree at the University of Regina focused on student activism at the Regina Campus of the University of Saskatchewan in the 1960s and early 1970s. For her Ph.D. dissertation, she plans to expand this study by placing student uprisings at English-Canadian universities within the larger global context of youth protest during this period.